CANBERRA, Australia -- Australia will immediately normalize relations with China and lift sanctions imposed after the 1989 Beijing massacre, Foreign Minister Gareth Evans said Tuesday.

In a statement Evans said that the decision followed the second review of restrictions, which were first modified in 1990.

The Australian government had maintained that relations with China would not be restored until China had made progress in human relations.

In a radio interview last Wednesday Evans said there had been a marginal improvement in human rights in China.

In Tuesday's statement Evans noted that freedom of speech and association continued to be severely repressed.

'There is no sign of a return to the very open climate of political and economic discussion which preceeded June 1989,' Evans said in the statement.

'The restrictions to be lifted apply to considering new proposals to technical cooperation and agricultural research activities with China, considering new applications for concessional financing under Australia's Development Import Finance Facility, and political party visits including exchanges of parliamentary delegations,' Evans said.

'The Australian government sees diminishing value in constraining our relations with China to a markedly lower level than those of like- minded countries, not to mention our regional partners,' Evans said.

'Australia recognizes China's important place in the Asia-Pacific region, and we remain committed to a long-term cooperative relationship with that country both bilaterally and as partners in the region.

'Our hope remains, that the Chinese leaders will allow the processes of reform and modernization to continue, and we will take every available opportunity to press that point,' Evans said.

The Australian government downgraded its relationships with Beijing a week after Chinese troops fired on the demonstrators in Tiananmen Square.

These included the suspension of high level visits and defense contacts, together with restrictions on some categories of new aid projects.

In January 1990 the blanket ban on ministerial visits was eased as part of an international climate that has seen a number of countries, including Japan and the United States, relaxing restrictions imposed on China.
